—Senators Knox, Lodge, and Bacon, and Representatives Burke, Young, and John Wesley Games. Their carriage was closely followed by that of Vice President Fairbanks and Mr. Sherman.

Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft entered the Capitol by the long flight of marble steps to the Senate wing. Each paused several times on the way up and lifted his hat to the cheering crowds, which were roped far back across the wide asphalt driveway. From the time they arrived at the Peace Monument they were given a continuous ovation. Crowds lined the narrow drive which they followed around the Capitol grounds and throngs tramped the sod in the parking.

Continuous Ovation.
Both the President and the President-elect were compelled to keep their heads bowed almost continually, so unceasing was the cheering and the salutes of those whom they recognized. The Vice President and the President-elect, too, were just as vigorously cheered.

After those came the Cabinet members, who were escorted into the building by Col. Daniel M. Ramsdell, the veteran sergeant-at-arms of the Senate, and a detail of the Capitol police.

Preceded by a squad of police, the President and President-elect and members of the Cabinet passed through the Marble Room into the President's room, in the former were many Senators who exchanged greetings with Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft and the others.

An escort of Secret Service men gathered about the corridors and a small detail was in the room with the President and Mr. Taft.

Sherman Greeted.
As the party passed the Vice President's room, Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Sherman left it and entered that office, where also were gathered many Senators.

The President, on entering the Executive's room, at once devoted himself to the signing of bills. This was disposed of with the least possible delay. He was in great good humor and did not seem at all downcast over the fact he was so soon to cast aside the cares of the office he has held for almost eight years. If the President-elect felt a solemn burden of obligation to the nation resting heavy upon his shoulders, he did not disclose it as he waited, receiving the congratulations of many and exchanging pleasant salutes. At times he laughed as heartily as a school boy. Mr. Roosevelt found time aside from the disposing of business, to shake hands and utter pleasant words.

Feel Storm Is Over.
In the pleasantness that passed between Mr. Roosevelt and members of the Senate, no one could have detected a trace of the storms that have swept back and forth between the Capitol and the White House so often. Still, it cannot be doubted that the incoming of Mr. Taft was viewed with particular satisfaction by the Senate leaders, most of whom were inwardly breathing easier with the arrival of the last hour of the last day of the Roosevelt Administration and the coming of the moment for the Big Stick to be laid aside.

During all this time the marble room was filled with members of the Diplomatic Corps, resplendent in their uniforms. The galleries rapidly filled. In the throng were many of the social leaders. Among them appeared members of the families of Senators and Representatives, of Cabinet members, members of the Diplomatic Corps, and high officials. The diplomatic gallery was brilliant with handsomely gowned women.

President's Guests.
The Senate reserved gallery, on the eastern side of the chamber, was set apart for the guests of the President, the President-elect, the Vice President, the Vice President-elect, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the Supreme Court justices, and of the Cabinet officers.

Mrs. Taft and others of her family occupied seats in the Executive gallery. As she entered, she was recognized and applauded.

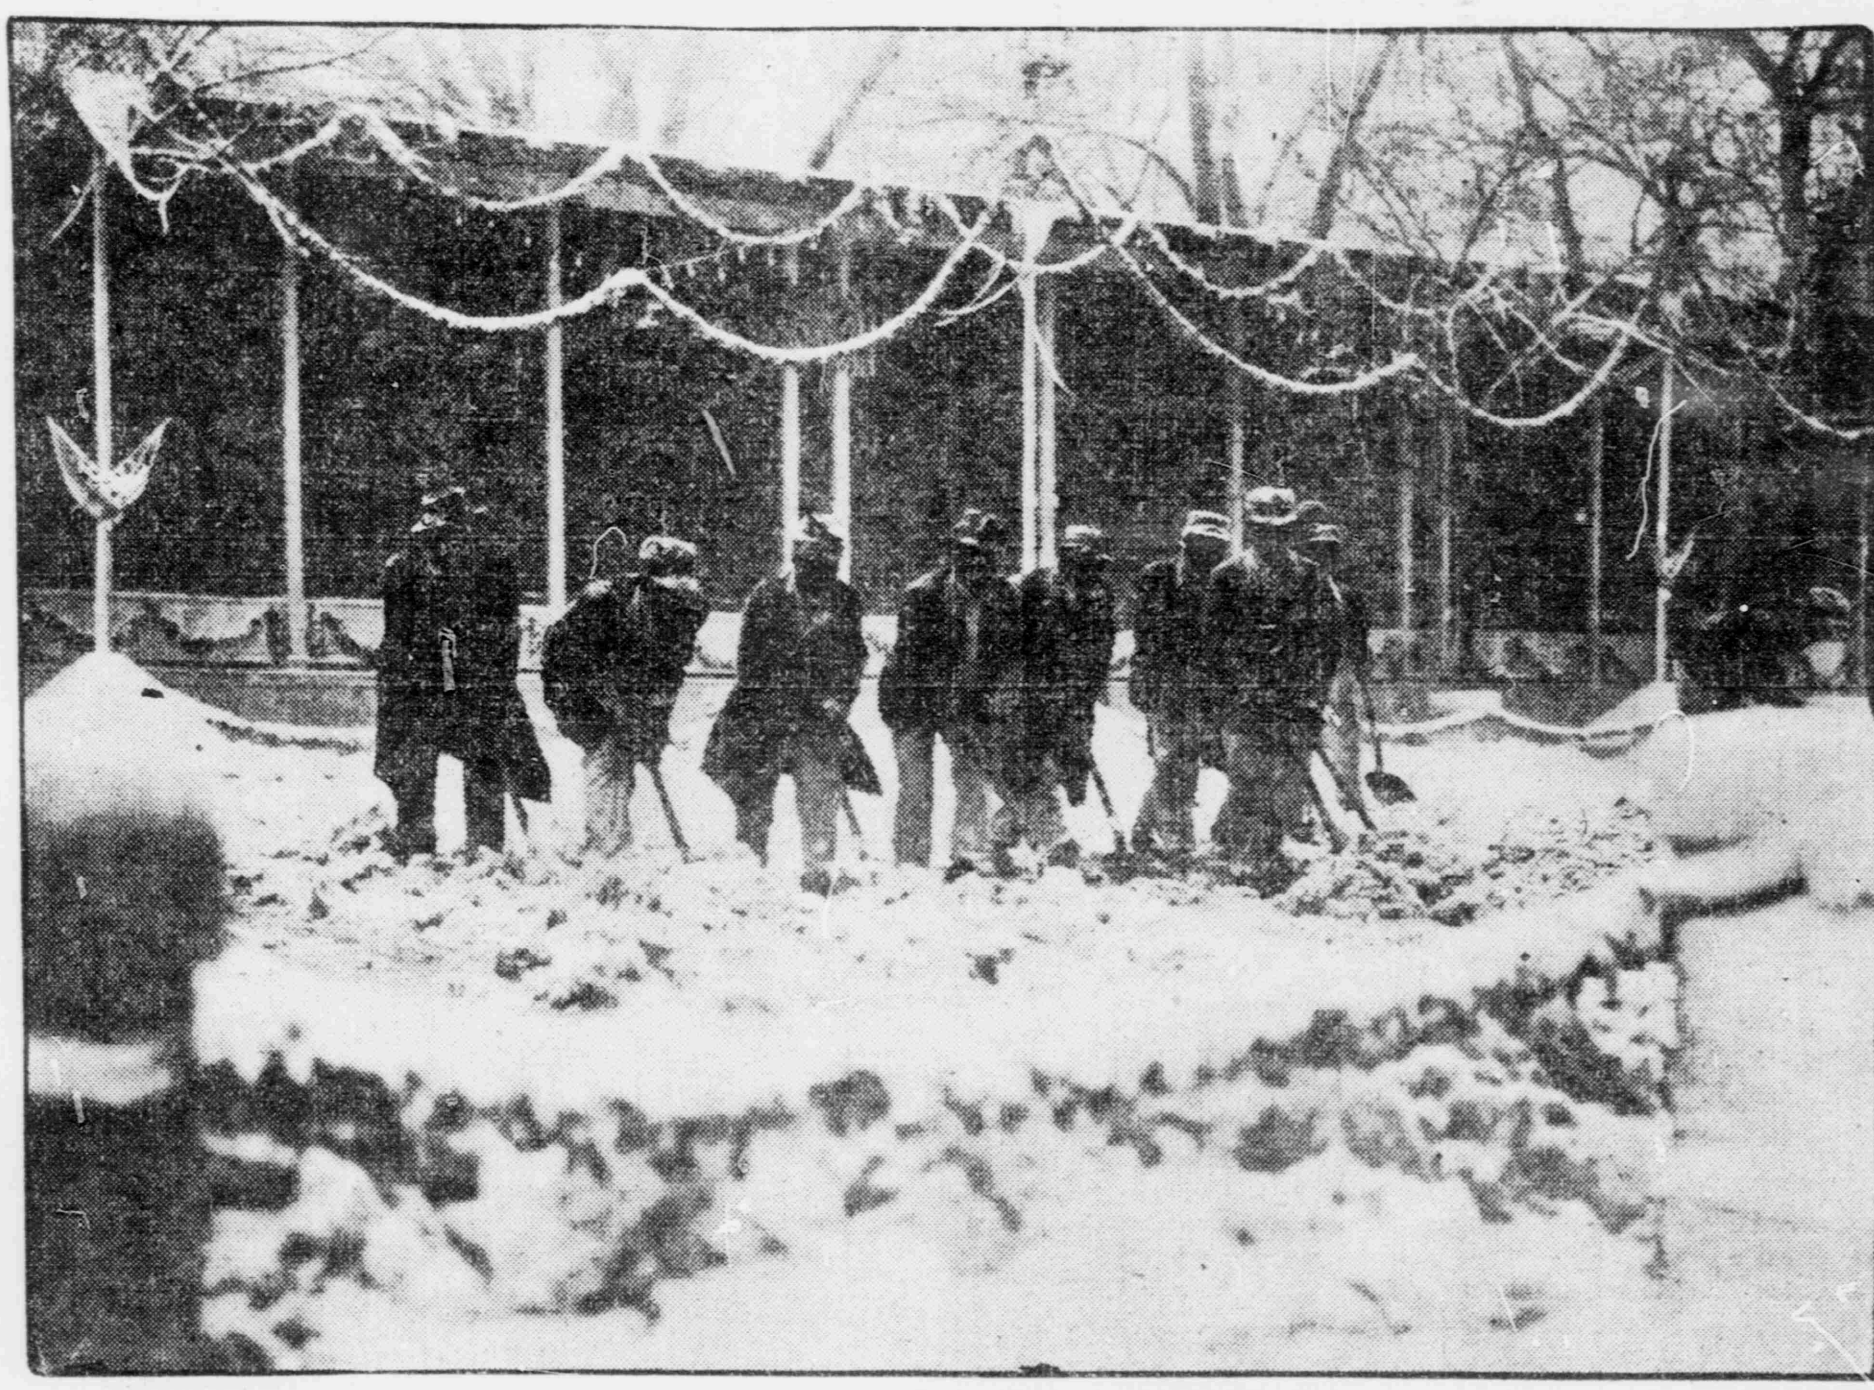

The Vice President, just before noon, entered the Senate chamber, and expressed the enjoyment of these years of his association with the Senate had brought and in the Executive gallery. The Supreme justices, headed by the House officers, came in at 11:50. As the justices and House members were announced, the Senate arose. The President-elect appeared. Then, as had been arranged, the Senators moved to the east side of the chamber, giving the west side, on the right of the Vice President, to those of the lower house.

Diplomatic Corps.
In front of the House members was the Diplomatic Corps. In chairs which had been placed just in front of the foremost row of desks, were the ambassadors, brilliant in their uniforms. The Italian ambassador, Baron Edmondo Mayor de Plinches, dean of the corps, held the seat of honor. On his left, facing the Vice President's desk, were the other ambassadors, and back of them the ministers. The Cabinet members occupied seats on the House side. The justices, with the venerable Chief Justice Fuller at their head, were seated on the east side of the chamber, in a position corresponding to the place of the ambassadors. Farther toward the east side and in front of the Senators were governors of States and other guests of distinction.

Military Men.
Gen. J. Franklin Bell, chief of staff of the army, in full dress uniform, was a conspicuous figure on the floor, as was also the Admiral of the Navy, George Dewey, in full paraphernalia of the highest rank of the service. National Chairman Hitchcock occupied a seat on the floor.

As the eye ranged about the chamber,

It rested upon other noteworthy figures. The venerable and illustrious James Bryce, ambassador from Great Britain, keenly alert to all that was passing, could not escape notice. Baron Kusunoki Takahira, the ambassador from Japan, was another prominent figure. Others who came in for much attention were Senators Hale of Maine, who has been witnessing inaugurations for the better part of a half-century; Aldrich of Rhode Island, the foremost power in the Senate; the fiery Foraker, now retiring to private life; the enfeebled Platt, about to give way to Elihu Root; the venerable Shelby M. Cullom of Illinois.

"Uncle Joe" Conspicuous.
"Uncle Joe" Cannon, at the Vice President's desk, loomed up. The crowds in the galleries singled out such House leaders as Tawney of Minnesota, Champ Clark, John Sharp William, Col. "Pete" Hepburn, Seneca Payne, John Dalzell, and the striking figure of Gen. J. Warren Kiefer, "the youngest old man of Congress."

It was a striking and a memorable scene. No wall decorations were permitted, but the chamber was bright with colors, the somber black of the dress of Senators, Representatives, and civilian officials being relieved by the glitter of gold and jewels on the uniforms of the diplomats and army and navy officers, and the rich and variegated gowns of the women.

Just as the clock's hands were drawing near to 12 the President and the President-elect entered from the south yard, escorted by Senators Knox, Lodge, and Bacon. The hum of conversation was suddenly ceased. Every eye was turned toward the distinguished pair as it passed down the aisle toward the desk of the Vice President. The President-elect was walking to the left of President Roosevelt. As he entered he glanced toward the Executive gallery and caught the eye of his wife. He smiled and nodded in recognition, and Mrs. Taft returned his salutation, with a smile and a bow and a wave of the hand. Repeatedly, as they passed down the aisle, the Executive and his successor bowed in acknowledgment of greetings.

Faces Vast Throng.
They took the chairs reserved for them in front of the desk, facing the vast throng. Being still the Chief Executive, Mr. Roosevelt took the right-hand chair.

The Congressional committee of arrangements then escorted the Vice President-elect to the chamber. Mr. Fairbanks administered the oath.

Fairbanks' Farewell.
At 12:55, Mr. Fairbanks began his farewell address to the Senate and thereafter declared the Senate adjourned, the Sixtieth Congress being at an end. Mr. Fairbanks said:

Senators: Again a new Administration succeeds to the control of national affairs in conformity with the will of the people, expressed in their sovereign capacity, under the orderly processes of the law. We witness the impressive transference of national power in accordance with their will deliberately recorded, with increased respect for our institutions.

We indulge the fervent hope that the Administration which assumes authority this morning, and more than that, in full measure our national needs; that we may continue in happy accord with the powers of the world; that peace, contentment, and progress may prevail throughout our borders, and that our country may grow in material strength and more than that, in better than that, that education, morality, justice, and patriotism, which are our chief sources of pride, may continue to increase among our people.

Takes Final Leave.
It now becomes my duty to take final leave of you; and in doing so I beg to return to you my profoundest thanks for the resolution which you have just adopted, personal to myself. To receive a vote of your approval without division is an honor which I shall carry with me to the end of my days and transmit to my children as a priceless legacy.

In these latter days much severe criticism is heard of the Senate of the United States, but has always been so since the time of our fathers, and that it will continue I have no doubt. The record of the Senate, to which its present membership has contributed is made and is beyond recall. I know of none better made by any legislative assembly anywhere. In my judgment it will stand comparison with the record of the Senate in its elder days.

It has been written by men learned in the science of government, inspired by as patriotic purposes as actuated their illustrious predecessors.

Is Important Part.

The Senate of the United States must remain an important part of a thoroughly independent, co-ordinate branch of the Government, neither arrogating to itself functions not devolved upon it under the Constitution, nor, upon the other hand, subtracting from its legitimate powers. Its legislative duties are as vast as its duties with respect to treaties and appointments to the public service are of very great moment. A servile Senate was not contemplated by its founders. The Senate is today as jealous as ever of its proper dignities and its just powers and as worthy as ever of the popular respect and confidence.

It requires no gift of prophecy to forecast that many varied and complex questions will come here for solution in the not very distant future—questions which will have a potential bearing upon the very structure of republican government and an important influence upon our social and industrial systems.

To you who shall remain, and to your successors, the country will look, and I believe it will look with confidence, for a solution which will be in harmony with the genius of American institutions and which will comport with our best national interest.

The Senate, it is sometimes said, is not always responsive to the popular will. Such assumption is erroneous.

judging by the record of legislation accomplished. The will of the people finds utterance in the public law in due course; not that will which is the unreasoning, passionate expression of the moment, but that will which is the fruit of deliberate, intelligent reflection.

The Senate of the United States was designed by our fathers to be a deliberative chamber in the fullest and best sense—a chamber where the passions of the hour might be arrested and where the better judgment of the people would find ultimate expression. Those who in their unreflecting moments would sweep it away would overturn one of the strongest safeguards of our political fabric.

Severs Personal Ties.

I can not sever the personal ties which have been formed here without deep emotion. I am your grateful debtor for countless courtesies and kindnesses, and to your generous assistance and thoughtful forbearance I am indebted for whatever success may have attended my efforts as President of the Senate.

It gives me pleasure to acknowledge the very great assistance which the Chief has always received from the officers of the Senate and from these efficient, faithful gentlemen at the desk.

For the able and distinguished citizen who has been knighted by the people to succeed me I bespeak that consideration and effective support which you have given me.

I wish for you each many years of strength and devotion to the interests of our common country whose welfare and whose honor you have sought to safeguard and advance with ceaseless vigilance and unvarying fidelity.

Under the operation of law we have reached the close of the Sixtieth Congress, and it becomes the duty of the Chief to declare the Senate adjourned without day.

Secretary of the Senate Charles G. Beane, then read the proclamation of the President calling the Senate in special session. The venerable chaplain, Edward Everett Hale, in the robes of his office, offered an invocation and asked all to join him in repeating the Lord's Prayer. The subdued murmur
